

Transcription:

(8)

- 1) Pin: /Pɪn/ ✓
- 2) Pen: ~~/Pɛn/~~ /Pen/ ✓
- 3) Pan: ~~/Pæn/~~ /Pæn/ ✓
- 4) Pain: ~~/Peɪn/~~ /Peɪn/ ✓
- 5) Pine: /Paɪn/ ✓
- 6) Pawn: ~~/Paʊn/~~ /Paʊn/ ✗
- 7) Plan: ~~/Plæn/~~ /Plæn/ ✓
- 8) Pan: /Pʌn/ ✓

(7)

Q: Imagine you are Lulverton Smith and narrate the story from the time Watson comes to meet you till Inspector Morton arrests you. (12)

→ Lulverton's point of view.

~~It was~~

It was around 6 in the evening, I had arrived into my office a few minutes ~~ago~~ ^{before}, and was about to write a report on the plantation field, before I was interrupted by my Butler. He spoke of a person by the name of "Dr Watson" ^{who} that wanted to meet me urgently. The name did not ring a bell in my memories, so I instructed my Butler to tell him to come later.

But suddenly, Watson barged into the room. I was outraged, about to give him a piece of my mind, until he mentioned the name "Sherlock Holmes". Holmes, oh Holmes. The visitor described the sickly condition of Holmes, and I maintained a serious face to not give anything away. My mind was churning with possibilities, and I was about to go with the visitor until he said that he had an appointment.

15 minutes later, I hailed a cab to Holmes. The visitor had mentioned something about "east end pier", a place I suspected Holmes thought was the origin of his disease. Oh, how wrong was he! I had done it! Finally but that snoring detective ⁱⁿ his place.

When I saw him, I smiled. The doctor had described him well. He looked to be in a terrible condition. As I chatted with him, I got to know that he had indeed fell for my trap. The irony was, it took a lot to design its lethality, but it was well worth it. At some point, Holmes asked for a glass of water, I pleadingly. I might as well give it, the man will die all the same. And so I also began to gloat about my trap ^{to him}, and told him the consequences of knowing about the death of my ~~own~~ nephew. After all, a dead man tells no secrets. ^{→ tales} (continued on next page)

As the ~~the~~ light of the sun faded and ~~evening~~ evening arrived, Holmes asked me to turn up the gas of the lamp. Very well! Will help me to see him better, and to confirm his death. I asked him what else he wanted.

"A ~~cigarette~~ cigarette" he said in a completely different, his normal voice. What? Wait, wasn't the man dying? How did his voice recover?

"What is the meaning of all this?" I said.

As Holmes explained, I felt my ~~body~~ ^{mind} leave my body. It was a play all along! He tricked me!
 soul

~~The~~ I heard someone taking stairs up behind me. It was ~~the~~ officer Norton. On Holmes words, the officer began the process for arresting me. I wondered where I had went wrong. That doctor, who looked so convinced about Holmes condition, the ~~the~~ visibility of the ivory box, or my gloating. I struggled a bit against the handcuffs, but it was of no use. I had lost.

10

Nice!